FISH HATCHERIES WOULD BE FINE FOR FISH COMPANIES

Mayor Thompson, Lake Michigan's publicity agent, looks favorably on the plan for a municipal aquarium for Chicago. "But," he said, "There should be more fish in the lake. Fish are to eat not to look at."

Then the mayor went on to suggest to the government that it would be a great and glorious thing to have fish hatcheries on the eastern side of the lake where all the little streams make spawning beds. He says these hatcheries would fill the lake with fish that, soon or later would grace the table of Chicagoans.

Unfortunately for Chicago this plan doesn't work out. Two miles off shore and running from Wilmette to Hammond, Indiana, are nets. Most of them belong to the Booth Fisheries Company. This hempen barrier, which makes Chicago's lake front the poorest fishing ground on the great lakes, is maintained all year around.

So if the government followed Mayor Thompson's suggestion we might have a few more fish for our tables but they would have to be purchased from the Booth Fisheries Co.

There is no pleasanter sight for the pessimist than a trip along the lake front Sunday to watch hopeful fishermen pull up perch fingerlings.
